Description:

Troth's Fortune was listed on the National Register of Historic Places in 1974. The main house at Troth's Fortune, dated between 1686 and 1710, has remained virtually unchanged since the National Register Nomination Form was prepared. However, at the time the form was written, the twentieth century additions to the house were not described. Also not described were the late-nineteenth century house and outbuildings located on the property.

There are two mid-to-late-twentieth century wood-frame wings extending from the northeast gable of Troth's Fortune. A covered brick walkway connects the additions to a mid-twentieth century reconstruction of a gambrel-roof brick kitchen. The first frame wing, built circa 1945, is directly connected to the main house and is 1½-stories tall with a side-gable roof covered in wood shingles. The southeast, or front elevation features a door in the third bay and two paired 8/8 double-hung windows in the first and second bays. There is a single gable dormer centered on the roof. It has one 6/6 double-hung window. The northwest elevation has a 1-story shed roof addition with triple 6/6 double-hung windows. There is a single gable dormer with a 6/6 window centered on the roof. There is one 6/6 double-hung window in the northeast gable end.

The second wood-frame wing extends from the northeast gable end of the first addition. Built between 1958 and 1974, it is 1-story tall with a side-gable roof covered in wood shingles. The southeast, or front elevation has a porch across the length of the elevation. The porch floor is paved with brick. The porch has a shed roof and square wood posts. There is a door in the second of the elevation and a 6-light awning window in the first bay. The northwest elevation has a door in the first bay. It is sheltered by a front-gable entry porch. There are two paired 6/6 double-hung windows in the second and third bays. A roof extends from the northeast corner of the second wood-frame addition to the southwest elevation of a brick building, covering brick walkway.

The 1½-story, gambrel-roof brick kitchen was reconstructed circa 1950, by Mr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Thomas, the owners at the time. The walls are laid in 3-to-1 common bond with old bricks which were whitewashed and brushed to resemble the old building. On the southwest elevation, the one closest to the house and connected to it by a covered walkway, there is a centered door. There are two shed-dormer windows, each with a 6/6 double-hung window. The southeast gable has triple 6/6 double-hung windows on the first floor, and a stairway leading to a doorway on the second floor. The stairway has a wheat design in its stair baluster, copied from the Dover Ferry House which previously existed a half mile away (Easton Star-Democrat, March 28, 1958). The northeast elevation has three small 3/3 double-hung windows. The first is located in the southeast corner, and the other two are paired at the northwest corner. There is a single shed dormer with a 6/6 double-hung window. There is a shed-roofed wood-frame shed extending perpendicular to the northwest corner of the northeast elevation. The northwest gable end has an interior end chimney, which is flanked by two small 3/3 double-hung windows.

In addition to the seventeenth century house and the additions made to it, there are also a late-nineteenth century house and outbuildings located on the property. The late-nineteenth century house is located north of the seventeenth century house. The driveway leading to the house turns to the left, going past the main house and around the late-nineteenth century house. The house is a 2-story, 2-bay wood-frame house with a side-gable roof covered in wood shingles. The house has a parged foundation, and a 1-story side-gable wood-frame addition at the northeast gable end. The windows are double-hung wood sash. The foundation of the addition is poured concrete. The house has a 1-story hipped roof porch on the southwest elevation and an exterior end chimney.

The southwest, or front elevation of the house has a hipped-roof porch with turned wooden posts, flat-sawn decorative brackets, and a square-baluster railing. There is a shed-roof lean-to addition on the northwest gable end and a 1-story side-gable addition on the southeast gable end. The first story entrance is located in the first bay of the house. The fenestration pattern is symmetrical with one 6/6 double-hung window in the second bay of the main block, one 6/6 double-hung window on the 1-story addition, and one 6/6 double-hung window in the lean-to addition. The second story has two 6/6 double-hung windows.

The southeast elevation consists of the gable ends of the main block and the 1-story addition. There is one 8-light fixed-sash window centered in the addition wall. There are louvered vents in the gable ends of the addition and the main block. A gable-roofed shed extends outward, perpendicular to the rear elevation. The southeast elevation of this shed has one 8-light fixed sash window.

The northeast, or rear elevation of the house has a front-gable shed or garage extending from the northwest corner. The fenestration pattern is symmetrical. There is one 6/6 double-hung window centered in the 1-story addition. There is one 6/6 double-hung window on the first story of the main block. The second bay is covered by the shed. There is a large door opening in the gable end of the shed. The second story of the main block has two 6/6 double-hung windows.

The northwest elevation consists of the northwest side of the shed, the side of the lean-to and the gable end of the main block. The roofs of the shed and lean-to addition are covered in corrugated metal. The chimney extends from the lean-to on the exterior of the gable wall. There is a 12-light door leading into the shed. There is one 1/1 double-hung window on the northwest side of the door. There is a single 6-light fixed-sash window centered in the lean-to wall. There are no window openings in the gable end of the main block.

There are five outbuildings dating from the late-nineteenth or early twentieth centuries, including a barn, a corn crib with attached machine shed, a machine shed, a shed, and a round corncrib. The barn is located northeast of the late-nineteenth century house and north of the main house. It is a 2-story, gable-roof frame barn with a 1-story drive-through portion extending perpendicular to the barn forming an L-shape. The barn has a brick foundation, vertical board siding, and a corrugated metal roof. There are 6-light fixed sash windows located irregularly on the first floor of the barn. The main entrance to the barn is located on the northeast elevation, in the courtyard created between the main barn and the drive-through ell.

The corncrib with the attached machine shed is located east of the barn and northeast of the main house. The corncrib portion is at the southeast end, and its roof is perpendicular to the roof of the attached machine shed. Both sections have gable roofs covered with corrugated metal and are of wood-frame construction. The building has a concrete foundation. The corncrib portion has walls of widely spaced vertical slats. The machine shed is open on the northeast elevation with three bays for the storage of large equipment.

The machine shed has an enclosed portion on the southeast end and has three open bays on the northwest end. The structure is of wood-frame construction, with a gable roof covered in corrugated metal. The enclosed portion of the machine shed is covered in vertical board siding. There are two 2-light sliding windows on the southeast gable end of the enclosed portion of the shed. The machine shed is located northeast of the corn crib with machine shed and barn.

The shed is a small wood-frame building with a front-gable roof with wood shingles. The walls are covered with board and batten siding and the shed has a concrete foundation. There is a door in the southwest gable end. The shed is located southwest of the barn, between the barn and the main house.

The final outbuilding is a round corncrib. It is of wood-frame construction covered in vertical boards, and has a standing seam metal roof. It is located southeast of the late-nineteenth century house, and southwest of the barn and shed. It is located northeast of the main house.

Interior access to the buildings was not available.

The entire Troth's Fortune complex is located at the end of a long, tree-lined gravel drive that branches off a dirt road from Dover Road. The complex is located at the top of a bluff overlooking the Choptank River. There is a white rail fence that connects the shed attached to the kitchen to the round corn crib, shed, barn, and late-nineteenth century house. The fence extends along the southeast side of the drive. The property's setting is rural, with no visual intrusion from surrounding properties.

Significance:

Since the National Register Nomination Form was prepared in 1974, the property has changed owners. The current owner is Charles Elizabeth William Wise. Ms. Wise purchased the property in 1987 from Frederick Chichester Thomas and Katerina Thomas, trustees of the estate of the former owner, Roberta R. Thomas Platt. Frederick C. Thomas and Roberta R. Thomas purchased the property in 1946. Frederick Thomas died in 1967, and Roberta Thomas was remarried to Charles Platt, Jr. Roberta R. Thomas Platt died in 1987, at which time her trustees sold the property with 40.5 hectares (100 acres).

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Troth's Fortune is one of the notable small dwellings of Talbot County, Maryland. Like many of Maryland's early farm houses, it has a gambrel roof, but it differs from others in that it has a stair tower and a richly detailed interior. It is situated about 1/2 mile north of the location of Dover Ferry, now the Route 331 bridge over the Choptank River.

It is a 3-bay-long brick structure measuring approximately 20 by 32 feet (plus tower) with two frame wings on the north-east. (The latter are 20th century additions and will not be discussed herein). Its principal facade, facing southeast to the Choptank River, is brightened by the glazed headers used in its Flemish bond brickwork. It is further detailed by a chamfered watertable with English bond beneath and two segmentally arched basement windows. Both windows of the facade have 12/12 sash, and the six-panel door has paneled jambs and trim on the outside of the brick. Three shed-roof dormer windows have 6/6 sash. The chimney on the southwest is contained within the gable while that on the opposite gable is partly within--partly without the gable; both chimneys have caps with plaster bands.

The southwest gable possessed 4 small windows extended to light the closets within. Those on the southeast side retain their original frames and have internal shutters only; the other two have had their frames removed and the gaps filled with brick. English bond is seen both above and below the watertable.

Common bond, with 3 rows of stretchers to 1 row of headers is employed in the northwest facade and northeast gable, as well as in the tower. A watertable brick is lacking on the northeast gable, and in place of the chamfered brick, the other two sides are a simple stepped brick. A door and window are located west of the stairtower on the northwest side of the house; the frame of the window appearing original. One window is located northeast of the tower and one in the gable roof tower itself. One dormer is located on each side of the assymetrically-placed tower.

The interior consists of two rooms, generally classified as the "hall and parlor" plan. The stairtower opens directly into the "hall." Raised paneling is original to the fireplace wall and the wainscoting of the remaining three walls. Above the 3-centered-arch fireplace are 3 tiers of horizontal panels; the lower consisting of a pair of panels conforming to the curve of the arch, and the other two being single horizontal panels. Flanking the fireplace are fluted pilasters on recessed panel pedestals with 6 flutes in each, the top and bottom terminating in a thumb nail stop. (This same feature is employed in the window reveals with the use of seven flutes). On each side of the fireplace are closets with 2-panel doors thereto. Series of 5 raised panels surrounds the doors. The balustrade chairrail continues across the paneling and doors in typical early

Georgian style. It also caps the dado and jogs downward where the window sill is lower and where it meets the door to the "parlor". The details of the paneling in the "hall" are very similar to those of "Boston Cliff" (1729), White Marsh (1735) and Hampden (c. 1720), all of which are in Talbot County. All evidence points to the fact that the paneling was installed when the house was constructed. It then seems logical that "Troth's Fortune" dates from around the same period of the aforementioned dwellings. Stylistically in rural Maryland, this type of woodwork dates between 1720 and 1760. The alterations (mentioned later) which occurred during the life of the house support this supposition.

Raised paneling on the protruding fireplace wall in the "parlor" boasts a large bolection molding around the fireplace and two panels of cupboard doors above flanked by a single panel and crowned by a single narrow horizontal panel. It lacks a cornice which the "hall" paneling possesses. In the west corner of the room is a tiny two panel door leading to the closet beneath the stair. A simple chair rail and baseboard are the period trim of the "parlor."

In the stair tower is a winder stair, with closet beneath. The closet wall consists of feather edge vertical boards bearing the same profile as the raised paneling in the "hall" and "parlor." A narrow 2-panel door opens into the closet. The stair itself has two treads leading to the winder treads, which number eight around the newel, and four leading to the second floor hall. A balustrade is located along the four upper steps, and from these in a right angle to the wall.

Originally, the second floor plan consisted of a hall, with one room on each side and a smaller room between. When the wing was added, the "parlor chamber" was converted into a bath, corridor and dressing room.

The "hall chamber" possesses a small fireplace with walls of raised paneling housing two closets, as below. A plaster wall separates the "hall chamber" from the other rooms, but other walls on the second floor are of vertical beaded boards. Flooring on the second story is original.

Changes which have occurred during the life of Troth's Fortune consist of several minor alterations, both outside and inside. Beginning on the river facade (southeast facade), the arches of the door and two windows were apparently removed. In addition, the brickwork flanking the windows was altered to accomodate narrower window frames. The cornice of the southeast facade apparently retains its original box, yet the crown and bed moldings are replacements.

Troth's Fortune

On the southwest gable, some addition must have been built and later removed since the two small windows on its northwest side were lengthened, then entirely filled with brick.

For apparently little gain, the northwest entrance door was moved approximately 18 inches closer to the tower as there is a seam in the brickwork as well as in the paneled dado within. Portions of the cornice on the northwest side have been replaced. Its window frame, however, appears original. Brickwork on the northeast side of the tower was altered during this century after a leanto had been removed which had had doors cut into both the "parlor" and the stair closet.

Inside, the alterations consist of new flooring on the first floor, installation of book cases in the "parlor" and the second floor room arrangement, mentioned above. Minor, and earlier, changes are evident in the exterior doors and trim in the "hall" and the probable replacement of the stair balustrade, which occurred around 1800.

Troth's Fortune is a very well-preserved house which has retained the best features of its early period as well as evidences of change. It is located on a one hundred acre farm and possesses a well planned and maintained yard as well as miscellaneous contemporary outbuildings.

8. SIGNIFICANCE, continued

In 1679 Troth patented two parcels of land, 400 acres of Troth's Fortune and 100 acres known as Troth's Addition. Seven years later he purchased 300 acres of a tract called Acton from John Acton, son of the original patentee. By his death in 1710, he possessed 1,216 acres in Talbot County, 500 in Dorchester, and an undetermined amount (but exceeding 200 acres) in Queen Anne's, a total of 2,000 acres or more. This huge amount of land is one indication of the great wealth William Troth accumulated through his business success.

The inventories of his estate further illustrate Troth's economic success, as well as showing the reason for it. The total value of the goods evaluated in the 1711 inventory is £929.18.3 1/2. The larger part of this inventory, which included his household goods, consisted of goods listed "in the store." An additional inventory returned in 1712 is for £276.6.2 3/4 of which £216 was "Cash in bank in ye hands of Jonath. Searth & Thos. Bond - merchts in London as per Acct.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Troth's Fortune, probably built between the years 1686 and 1710 (according to the documentary evidence), is a well-preserved example of late 17th century Maryland vernacular architecture. William (I) Troth bought a tract of 300 acres called Acton in 1686 on which he built the house today known (erroneously)¹ as Troth's Fortune. Its gambrel roof, 1 1/2-story height, and two-room width make this house typical of the 1680's and 1690's in tidewater Maryland. Although it may seem small by today's standards, its two good-sized rooms on the first floor and three small rooms upstairs, made it twice the size of the numerous less wealthy planters' houses. The unusual feature of the medieval-style stairtower on the rear facade and the detailed circa 1720's woodwork of the interior give Troth's Fortune an individuality which adds much to the interest of the house.

In addition to its architectural importance, Troth's Fortune provides a clear view of two aspects of the economic and religious life of colonial Talbot County. William (I) Troth, the builder of the house, was a member of that small class of colonial planters who combined agriculture with business and trade to make a living considerably above that of the average planter. He was also a member of the Society of Friends, a religious group which became particularly large and well established in Talbot County.

¹Troth patented 400 acres as Troth's Fortune in 1676. He may have built a house on this tract, but it is not the one known today as Troth's Fortune as this house now stands on the tract called Acton. This confusion may be attributed to H. Chandlee Forman's record of the house in his book, Early Manor and Plantation Houses of Maryland (1934). He calls the house Troth's Fortune, although it is called "Acton or the Troth Farm" in the property deeds for both 1932 and 1936. This error was picked up and repeated by many people who later wrote about the house and Troth's Fortune has now become its common name.

current."² These two amounts combined give Troth a net worth in goods of approximately £1,206. This was a very large amount for the early 18th century, considering that only 0.7 percent of Maryland's planters wereworth over £1,000 in 1710.³

Troth achieved this wealth through his mercantile activities rather than his agricultural ones. Although most larger tobacco planters traded directly with England, the smaller ones usually sold their crops to other planters in the colonies.⁴ They received less money this way, but the risk of transportation across the ocean and debt to English merchants was eliminated. As for the larger planters, their advantages in this system are explained by A. P. Middleton in his book Tobacco Coast:

[They] competed with the factors [employed by the London merchants] in buying tobacco from the smaller planters, and shipped it along with their own to England on consignment. In order to enter the purchasing market they were obliged to import large quantities of European and West India goods and to keep a store.... In return for tobacco sent to Great Britain on consignment, they imported goods for their stores as well as for their own use, and marked them up in price and extended credit, much as factors did, in order to obtain control of the smaller planters. Thus emerged a group of powerful merchant-planters, peculiar to the tobacco colonies, who engaged in all the mercantile pursuits yet considered themselves primarily planters.⁵

Middelton also mentions that this system was more prevalent in the 18th century than in the 17th,⁶ which makes William Troth one of the first to participate in and profit from it.

Troth's Fortune

To see Troth in comparison to the other planters on the Eastern Shore in the late 17th century, one need only substitute his name for William Worgan's in the following paragraph from Aubrey C. Land's article, "The Planters of Colonial Maryland":

As for planting, William Worgan did little more than his poorer neighbors. He owned no slaves; almost no one in Maryland did in 1677. His total labor force consisted of five indentured servants,Even so he could count himself well off by comparison with planters in his parish or in the county. The overwhelming number of these-if 80 percent is overwhelming-had neither servants nor slaves, lived in one-room houses, enjoyed net incomes of about £8 to £15 sterling a year from two or three hogsheads of tobacco raised with their own hands, and counted their entire visible estates at something less than £100. These planters were Worgan's customers, the milieu in which he lived, and his stature as economic man was greater than his neighbors by the height of mercantile business. Without them Worgan would not have been possible; without him their lot would have been sorry indeed. In economic terms Worgan must be accounted a success. And his fortune-for £300 was a fortune in Maryland of the 1670's-derived from his mercantile pursuits, not from his planting.⁷

Although Worgan lived on the Eastern Shore a generation before Troth, the latter's fortune of £1,200 was enough to make up for any difference in the value of the pound from 1677 until 1710.

Addenda to #7 Architectural Description

¹It is known locally that there was a still kept in the cellar of Troth's Fortune during Prohibition which blew up.

²According to Mrs. Platt, this door was not moved, but its size was altered. It was originally six inches wider and six shorter.

³According to Mrs. Platt, these doors were originally windows, although one may have been a "death door."

Troth's Fortune

William Troth's properties in Talbot County were located on the north side of the Choptank, and the house and store on Acton were only a mile or two up the river from the small town of Dover. The shops carrying his tobacco to and bringing his supplies from England probably came into this port which thrived until the late 18th century but has now completely disappeared.⁸

Stores such as Troth's, according to P. A. Bruce in his Economic History of Virginia, were "found in great numbers on every navigable stream" in colonial Virginia, "the store (being) one of the principal institutions.... whether the property of a foreign or a native merchant."⁹ Margaret Shore Morris suggests that this was also true in Maryland in her book, Colonial Trade in Maryland, 1689-1715.

The housing for these stores is also considered by Bruce, who says that they were sometimes kept in a room of the dwelling house, but were more often housed in a separate building. This, he suggests, would have been a "boarded house with a loft and with a shed."¹⁰ That Troth's store was probably in a separate building can be determined by comparing the rooms listed in the 1711 inventory with those in the house today. The hall and parlor of 1711 are the two rooms downstairs and the other chamber and another unnamed room in the inventory are the two larger rooms which were upstairs before the 20th century alterations. This leaves no space in the house itself for a store and thus it was probably kept in another building.

A very wide variety of wares was sold in these stores as they were almost the only source of manufactured goods available to the colonists. William Troth stocked everything from tin pans and needles for the housewife to powder and shot for the planters. A large part of his inventory was taken up by many bolts of cloth, including calico, damask, crape, serge, linsey, and lining (linen), some of which was imported from Ireland. Another largely stocked item was shoes, fifty-two pairs for men and twenty-two for women. Leather, window glass, iron, paper, nails, carpenters' tools, hoes, two old guns, and two old chafing dishes are a further sampling of the goods he offered for sale.¹¹

William Troth died in 1710, leaving both the Troth's Fortune and the Acton properties to his son Henry. He also left the prosperous mercantile business outlined above, but when Henry Troth died only nineteen years later in 1729, there was no trace of this once important business in the records. He still had contact with England as shown by a payment of £14 to John Hanbury, London merchant, included in a 1742 account of his estate, but there is no mention of a store in the inventory taken in 1729. The value of his possessions as shown in this inventory came to £840, still a considerable sum but not as great as that left by his father, perhaps a further indication that the store was no longer operated on the property today known as Troth's Fortune.

Quakerism arrived in Talbot County in the 1650's spreading there from Annapolis and Kent Island where it first appeared as a strong movement in Maryland. Widespread and violent persecution of members of the Society of Friends was limited to the 1660's. In the following decade the sect flourished in Talbot County as its religion became more widely accepted in the colony. Visits by three well-known traveling Friends at this time also encouraged men with more education to become leaders in the meetings.¹² Thus, by the time William Troth first appears in the records of the county in 1679, Talbot had become a strong center of Quakerism on the Eastern Shore.

The Quakers had always been opposed to the taking of human life whether in war or in peace, and they continued this tradition in the colonies. In 1694, William (I) Troth was appointed a press master for Bolingbroke Hundred in Talbot County. This position was formed by an Act of Assembly which required that "honest and substantial men of their counties" be selected for the duty.¹³

These men were essentially to make sure that goods were not illegally taken from the people of the county to support the local and colony troops, making it a post not inconsistent with Troth's Quaker views.

Troth's grandson William (II), who inherited Acton and its dwelling house from his father Henry when he was only three years old, was apparently an active member of Third Haven Meeting. In 1750 he was one of four men selected to collect contributions for the repairs of the meeting house. He was appointed the "keeper of the Register for Births, marriages, and Buryalls" in 1758, a post he held for five years. In 1763 he is said to have been "removed from hence," meaning Third Haven vicinity, but he was apparently back again in 1768 when he freed two slaves. The following year he had a mare forcibly taken from him for his refusal to pay the tithe to the Church of England.¹⁴

Slavery was not early regarded as inconsistent with the tenets of Quakerism.¹⁵ William (I) Troth owned thirteen slaves when he died in 1710 and Henry Troth had twenty-four at his death in 1729. Occasional denunciations of slaveholding were made before 1750, but it was not until mid-century that concern over this became more widespread, and not until 1777 did the possession of slaves become an offense for which one could be disowned by the meeting.

The records of William (II) Troth's manumission of his slaves follows closely the stands taken against slavery by the Eastern Shore Quakers. He freed two slaves within a decade of their first expression of anti-slavery sentiments in 1759. After the visit of John Woolman, a well-known Quaker opponent of Negro slavery, to Talbot in 1766, there was a rash of manumissions in the county. It was at this time that Troth freed the rest of his slaves.

The Society of Friends on the Eastern Shore remained strong throughout the 18th century, but suffered a decline during the 19th century due to a number of factors, including migration from the area and a stiffened moral code.¹⁶ That this decline extended to the Troth family is shown by a comment from the records of Third Haven Meeting in 1817 that William (IV) Troth had "so far deviated from the principles of Truth, humanity and Justice as to offer to sell a Coloured Boy entitled to freedom to residents of the State of Georgia."¹⁷

William (IV) Troth inherited the property from his father William (III) in 1814. When he died in 1852, the property passed to his sister, Ann Birchhead (Troth) Brown, who sold it two years later to Daniel Cowgill of Delaware. The present owners, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic C. Thomas, bought the house in 1946 and subsequently built two additions on the northeast gable end.
